

MILLI ARCHIVES FOUNDATION

The Milli Archives Foundation is a non-profit network of archives and archivists dedicated to building, nurturing and sustaining archives across India.

What is an archive?

Archives preserve, describe and make accessible records of enduring historical significance. Such archival records offer valuable insights into the context and process of our lives, ranging from an old family photo album and a bundle of letters between a student and their mentor, to oral histories from community elders, minutes of corporate board meetings and banners from social movements. By creating an accessible archive, we can draw from our collective memory and share a diversity of stories for the future.

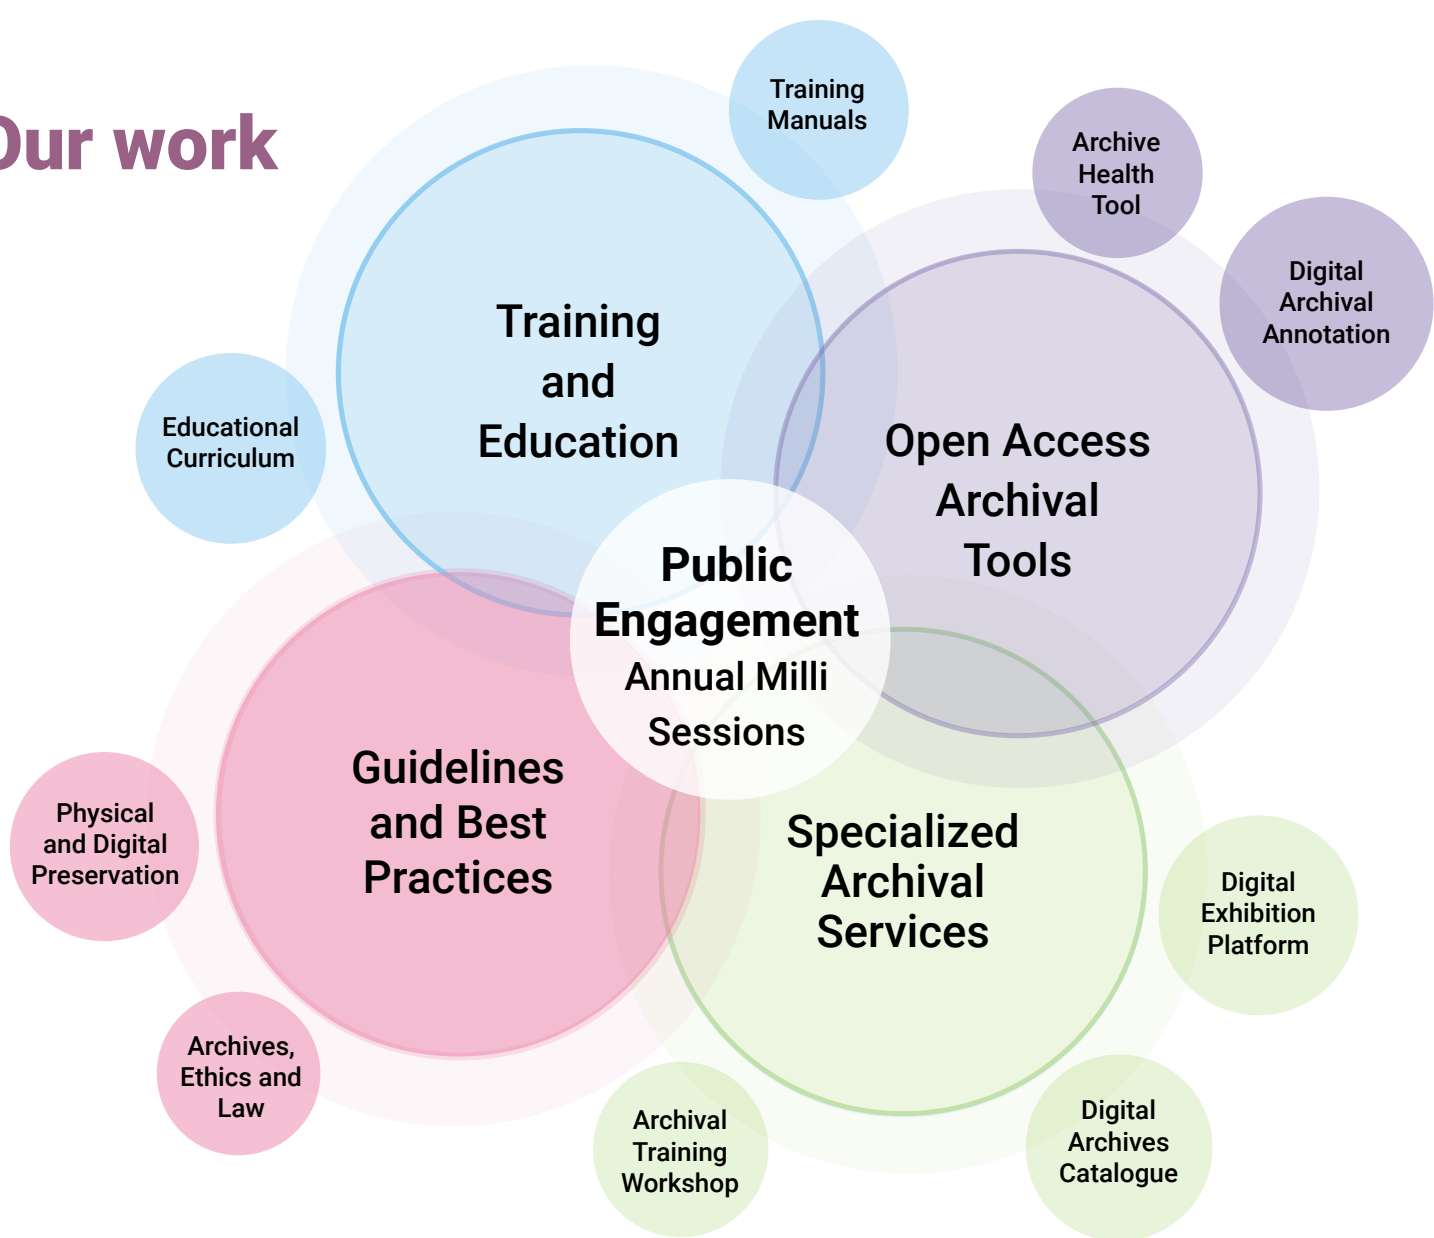

Why Milli?

We need to nurture archives. This includes archival standards, preservation and conservation guidelines, open access teaching manuals, digital tools to allow the public to find and share archival material, and see the archive as part of their daily lives. Milli works with individuals, families, organizations and communities toward building, nurturing and sustaining our collective memory and records in the form of accessible archives. Memory matters, and Milli is here to help.

The name, Milli, borrows from 'á milli', Icelandic for 'between', the way we think of the archives being the in-between space between our collective and shared stories. It came up in 2017 during conversations within the Milli digital team.
